5. WEEKLY OUTLOOK

Before last Tuesday (Feb.27), the S&P 500 was holding on to its gains, the Nasdaq Composite was trading near a six-year peak, and the DJIA had not had a 3% correction intraday in more than three years.

All that has changed. All of a sudden the S&P 500 gave up all of its gains for this year, and the Dow was down for three digits. Sell order overloads caused the NYSE computers system jam, and led the Dow to plunge another 200 points for closing.

In only in day, approximately $600 billion in market capitalization was wiped out. Even with the modest recovery in all markets on Wednesday, Tuesday's damage was bigger than we imagined possible. And over the next two days, all three major markets lost more ground; the weekly closes were down more than 4%.

Lots of pundits blamed the melt-down on the Chinese market, but anyone who could not anticipate the correction and instead believed this market could go up forever, should only blame themselves

The signals were clear, as we warned in previous trading plans, and in the week of Feb. 20-24, all markets already gave huge warning signals that a significant downside correction in the ES contract was unavoidable:

- A narrow weekly range with lower volume on upside movement;
- unable to breakout 1465 level for 7 days;
- and always closed below 1465.

All this was clearly telling us this market was unable to move higher anymore. The March contract didn't signal the high, but the June contract clearly told us on Feb. 23 and confirmed by Feb. 24 that the high was in. Inexperienced traders often neglect the importance to of the next contract, but rollover day is Thursday, and by the end of this week the June contract will be the dominant instrument in the futures market.

Now the damage has begun. We are only seeing the first impulse downside movement, but more is on the way soon. All last week the ES sold off in the afternoons. The ES has a very short-term oversold condition and a bounce should be expected Monday and Tuesday if the 1371-70 level holds. The ES could bounce up to its 20 weekly moving average line for testing before it starts to its second leg down move.

But for the longer term, we have just seen the start of the party. Weekly indicators have just started to turn down and there is lots of room for a downside move. The first real solid support is around the 1320-1312 range, but we have two gaps around 1368.50-1372.50 (Nov.6/06) and 1359-1361.75 (Oct.12/06) that need to be filled first, and may offer temporary support.

Our trading strategy still is SHORT ON BOUNCE until the trend changes.

Weekly major resistance level 1416.50 and Support level 1359.

6. DAILY OUTLOOK

After 8 down days, all major three markets bounced from their first leg down movement low to close up strongly. Today as long as 1389-1390 level can be held up, long term uptrend top band area (1406-1408) should be retested by ES.

Daily indicators show that yesterday's rally is smoothing out market oversold condition. One more day bounce still should be expected.

7. TRADING STRATEGY FOR Mar. 7, 2007

ES made its lower lows in its overnight market and gaped up above 15 points for strong opening yesterday. This kind of movement had previous day's shorts running into the market for covering and pushed price going higher for closing.

Today if price goes down to 1389-1390 level first, buying pressure will be seen around this range. As long as this range can be held up, ES will go back up to yesterday's high for testing. Any breakout yesterday's high 1399.50 will lead ES go higher to 1406-1408 range.

If price gaps up at open, looking for reversal signal after 11am. Failure to hold 1388.75 level in later afternoon could lead ES lower to 1382.25-1379 level or further low to 1375.
